General Charles H. Grosvenor has another prophet. The source of his inspiration is unknown to the public. but he talks of the election of Mc-Kinley in November as though it were a dead certainty. The whole number of electoral votes is 447, 224 being necessary to elect. In 1896 McKinley received 271, and Bryan captured 176. Mr. Grosvenor predicts, with the air of an inspired prophet, that in November McKinley will receive 278, and Bryan 132, leaving 37 votes doubtful. He concedes the Southern States (save West Virginia and Maryland) and Nevada to the Demoerats. He expresses doubt as to North Carolina.

Stretching his imagination he admits that Bryan may possibly get 155 votes, the remainder going to McKinley. The tranquil confidence of this prophet does not appear to be disturbed because the Democrats claim a chance to carry Maryland, New York, Indiana and other doubtful States. The Democrats need not be disturbed by Mr. Grosvenor's play upon words in dealing in "futures,"
